The patients included in the clinical trial were those who were scheduled for elective surgery and who were not taking any medications that could affect the results of the study. The patients were recruited from the operating room and the preoperative area. The patients were screened for eligibility criteria and then enrolled in the study. The patients were then randomized to either the control group or the intervention group. The patients were then followed up for 24 hours postoperatively. The primary outcome was the time to discharge from the hospital. The secondary outcomes were the incidence of postoperative nausea and vomiting, pain, and patient satisfaction.
